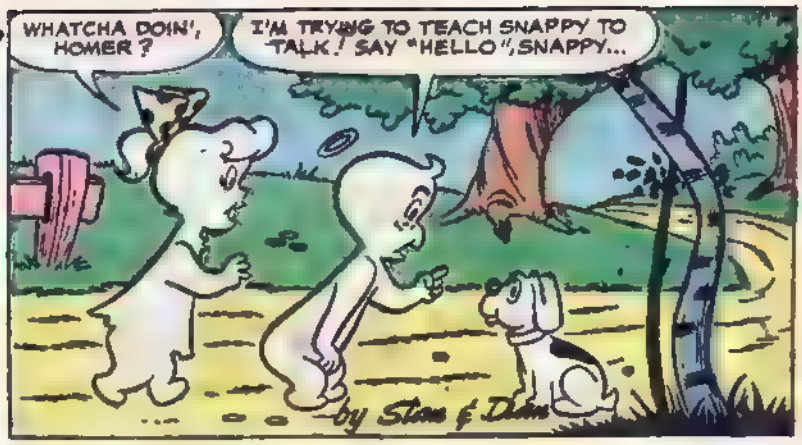
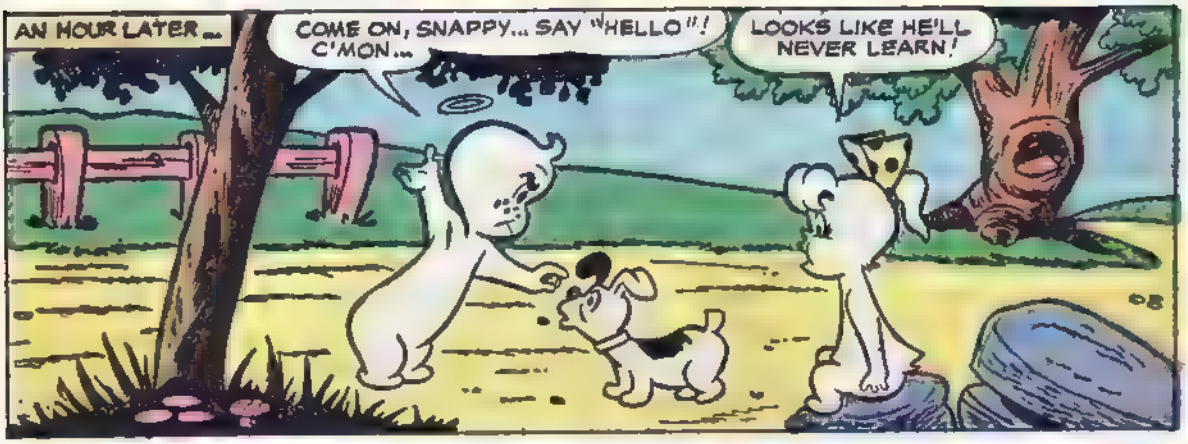
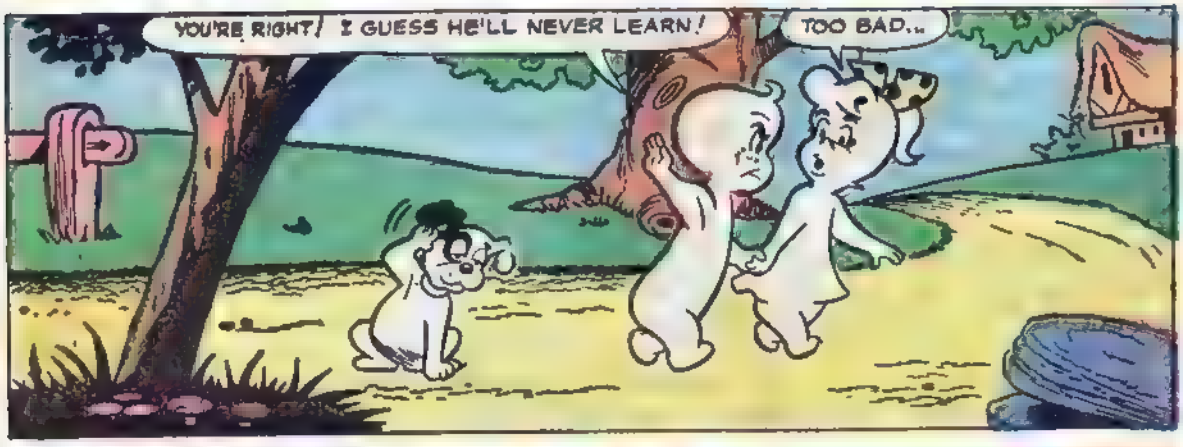
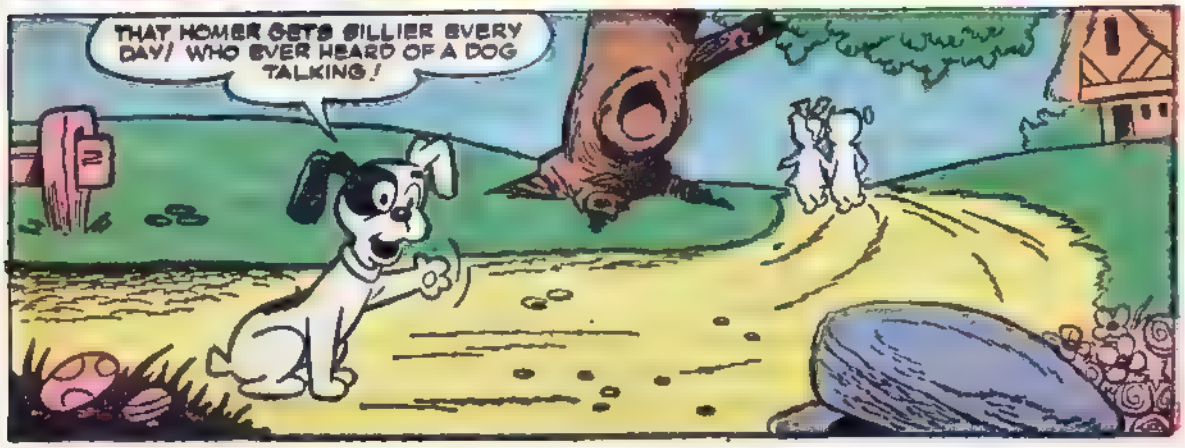
The GHOST DOG!









THE SECRET CLUB

"NO! Definitely not, Robert Carter. You cannot go outside the yard today," Bertie's mother told him in a very final way.

"Well, then if I can't go outside the yard, can David come in and play with me?"

"All right, if you promise to behave yourselves," his mother told him.

Bertie went out the back door, careful not to slam it the way he generally did, and went out to the fence. "OK, Davie . . . mother said it was all right for you to come in and play."

Davie hopped over the fence and then stood in front of Bertie. "Well, what are we gonna do now that I'm inside?"

"We could play ball," Bertie suggested.

"You lost your ball yesterday. That's why you can't go outside your yard today, remember?" Davie told him.

"Tag?"

"With only two of us . . . and besides, you know every place to hide. This is your own back yard."

The two of them sat on the back steps, their heads in their hands trying very hard to think of something to do. Something exciting and fun that they'd never tried before. But each time one would suggest something, it would turn out to be no good.

"I've got it," Bertie shouted suddenly. "We'll start a secret club!"

"Swell," Davie agreed right away. ". . . With a secret password and secret handshake and secret signals . . ."

"Sure," Bertie added, "and a secret meeting place."

". . . And secret code that nobody but us will know."

Then the two boys started to work. . . .

"The secret password could be . . . ummm . . . something long like 'Constantinople'," Bertie said.

"Swell, and every time we want to contact each other, you just send me a note with 'Constantinople' on it and I'll come right away."

"What about the code?" Bertie asked.

"Well . . ." that was a little harder to figure out. "We could just write the words backwards, like instead of D-A-V-I-D, it would be D-I-V-A-D."

"Hey, that's super . . . that way nobody'll ever be able to tell what we write."

"You know though," Bertie frowned a little, "it won't really be too much fun with just two of us. We ought to have more members."

"OK," Davie agreed. "Let's ask Tommie and Dick and then there's the new boy down the street."

"One thing though," Bertie said, "no girls!"

"Natch!" David nodded very firmly. "No girls!"

Bertie and Davie spent the rest of the afternoon figuring out whose garage was going to be their clubhouse and other important questions. By the next afternoon, after school they had gotten everything just about settled and they chose Bertie's garage to meet in. At four o'clock on the dot, all the fellows met for their first secret club meeting.

"We've got to get a good name for our club," somebody said right away.

"We'll take a minute and everybody think hard," Bertie said.

Everything was quiet for a long time inside the garage. Everybody was thinking very hard, but then just as they were all ready to come up with suggestions, a dreadful pounding started on the garage doors.

"Tommy . . . Tommy . . . come out here. You promised to fix my scooter this afternoon."

"Who's that?" Bertie looked very darkly at Tommy.

"Judy, my kid sister," moaned Tommy.

"Well, don't let her come in here," Bertie yelled. "In this club the first and A-Number-1 rule is NO GIRLS."

"But . . ." Tommy started to explain, but before he even got started, the door burst open and there stood not only Judy, but Pattie too.

"Mother said you were to come home right away, David," Pattie told her brother.

"Aw gee, Pattie . . ."

"You girls have to get out of this garage," Bertie stood right in front of them so they couldn't move another step. "This is a secret meeting room for our secret club."

"I don't think it's very secret," little Judy said. "I knew you were in here all the time."

"It's supposed to be a secret, but when other people come nosing around . . ." Bertie didn't even get a chance to finish because Pattie walked right past him over to Davie.

"Mother sent me out looking for you because she just got finished baking a whole bunch of cookies and she thought maybe you'd want some."

Davie looked proud, but it didn't last very long.

". . . But if this is supposed to be a secret club and no girls are allowed, I'll just go home and tell her that I couldn't find you because . . ."

"No, wait a minute, Pattie," Davie cut off her threat.

Pattie pretended not even to hear Davie though. She turned around, hooked her arm through little Judy's and walked right back out of the garage again. All the fellows stood still for a minute and stared at Davie.

"It isn't my fault, fellows. Bertie was the one who wanted to make the club such a secret. And he was the one who thought up the 'no girls' rule too."

Bertie looked all around and saw the fellows staring at him. He didn't want to be the cause of all of them missing those cookies. He could see through the windows of the garage that Pattie and Judy were walking down the driveway to the street. If he let them get away, they'd probably never get any cookies from Davie's mother.

"What good is a secret club with no girls if you never get anything to eat?" Davie inquired very wisely.

Everybody seemed to have the same idea Davie did because they all rushed to the windows and called very loudly . . . "Pattie, come on back. You can be a member of our club too."

Pattie started back up the driveway, a gleeful smile on her face, when Bertie elbowed his way through the group and stood at the front of it, his hands on his hips.

"All right," he looked very serious. "She can be a member . . . but only under one condition. She's gotta bring enough cookies for everybody."

"Gee, OK, fellas . . . I'll be right back," and Pattie ran down the driveway again toward her own house.

"Can I be a member too?" a little voice asked. Judy was standing by her big brother.

"NO!" Bertie said definitely. "One girl member of this secret club is enough. We can't be letting every girl in the block in . . . after all," he apologized a little bit, "she is bringing the cookies."

"I can bring something too," Judy spoke up.

"What?" Tommy inquired dubiously.

"Mother just made a great big pitcher of lemonade and said that it was a shame you were all out here and couldn't drink it up."

That settled it. From there on, all the secret plans of the secret club went up in smoke. Pattie came back to the garage with the cookies, and little Judy went home with Tommy and brought back enough lemonade for them all.

"Some secret club," Bertie grumbled between bites of cookie and gulps of lemonade.

"Oh, it's still secret," Davie looked up cheerfully. "We just changed the rules a little . . . to include some very secret cookies and lemonade."
